Athletes asserting their IP rights: Kawhi Leonard gets set for a not so Kawhi'et off-season

June 14, 2019 by Alexandre Dumais

After recently defeating one of the greatest NBA dynasties on the court, Raptors star and NBA Finals MVP, Kawhi Leonard is set to take on one of the world's largest brands off the court. On June 3, in the middle of the NBA Finals, Leonard filed a lawsuit in the U.S. District Court of California against Nike for allegedly stealing an original design he claims he created before signing an endorsement deal with Nike. Although commonly referred to as the "Klaw" logo, Nike's US copyright registration of said logo refers to it as the "Kawhi Leonard Logo." The logo, a nod to Leonard's famously large hands, includes an outline of his hand in a stylized fashion containing both his initials and his jersey number. Leonard claims he contemplated and conceived a personal logo in college and later refined the logo in late 2011 before signing with Nike.
