Grooveshark Fails to Navigate DMCA Safe Harbor

November 25, 2014 by Andrew Hunter

The recently announced decision of the United States District Court in Manhattan, UMG v. Escape Media Group \(Grooveshark\), serves to further elucidate the terms on which service providers can expect legal protection if their users are found to be uploading infringing content. More importantly, it gives us an excellent example of the differences between the US and Canadian systems, and the principle of "secondary liability".

Certainly Commendable but Perhaps not Practical – Canada's Competition Bureau Releases Guidelines on Pharmaceutical Patent Litigation Settlements

November 18, 2014 by Adam Falconi

On September 23, Canada's Competition Bureau ("the Bureau") announced landmark guidelines regarding the consideration of pharmaceutical patent litigation settlements under Canada's competition law framework. The Bureau's guidelines on this issue were released as part of a white paper titled Patent Litigation Settlement Agreements: A Canadian Perspective. These settlement agreements attract concern from competition regulators due to their potential to take the form of so-called "pay-for-delay" or "reverse payment" arrangements where a generic manufacturer agrees to delay the launch of a competing generic product in exchange for a transfer of value (monetary or otherwise) from the brand company. These types of agreements are targeted due to their ability to cause decreased competition which leads to higher pharmaceutical costs for consumers.
