Substantially Different or Substantially the Same Approach to Copyright Infringement?

January 29, 2014 by Alex Buonassisi

In Cinar Corporation v Robinson, The Supreme Court of Canada ruled that a copyright protected work can be infringed not only by literal reproduction, but also by copying substantial features from a work. In the decision, which awarded damages to the author of a children's TV show, the court clarified the test for substantial reproduction... or did it?

My time at Industry Canada as an IP Intensive student intern last fall was spent working within the Strategic Policy Sector (SPS), and more specifically a sub-group within the SPS called the Copyright and Trade-mark Policy Directorate (CTPD). The CTPD, along with the Department of Canadian Heritage and the Canadian Intellectual Property Office (CIPO), is responsible for developing and advancing Canadian copyright and trade-mark law and policy. As someone with a specific interest in copyright and trade-mark law, I could not have asked for a better hands-on learning experience.
